Winner will radio Europe with PERRY COMO

Copyright 1944 FAWCETT PUBLICATIONS, INC.

BOYS AND GIRLS: During the war you did such a splendid job collecting scrap materials and buying War Bonds . . . I call on you now to help feed hungry children in Europe—children just like you, just your age. Here's how to join the CARE Corps. Read what you do:

- 1 Form a 15-25 Corps. Be President. Get all your friends to contribute 15c or more to join your corps whose object is to raise $15.00 for one CARE Food Package—40 pounds—the kind the army gave its parachute troops to keep them strong. I will send you members' buttons FREE when your check is received—one for each member and a beautiful CITATION Scroll for you, the President.
- 2 Each Corps competes with each other. For each additional Food Package your Corps sends I will give you an OAK LEAF to add to your Citation. When you get FOUR OAK LEAVES on your Citation you get a CAPTAIN MARVEL GOLDEN CITATION.

3 The President of the Corps sending the greatest number of Food Packages will speak on Short Wave Radio with a boy in Europe that his Corps has fed—on Perry Como's CHESTERFIELD SUPPER CLUB PROGRAM over N.B.C.

4 Use the coupon when you send the money. Each food package unit is $15.00. But don't send cash—send check or money order. Address: CAPTAIN MARVEL "Share Thru CARE Corps," Fawcett Publications, Inc., 1501 Broadway, N. Y., N. Y.

CAPTAIN KID

AT THE pet SHOW

THE SPACE OLYMPICS

IT. JON JARL of the Space Patrol set his jaw grimly and piled on more speed. The rockets of his speedy police ship rose to a thundering crescendo, and every beam groaned with the strain. The rocket ship hurtled through space at terrific velocity.

"I've got to make it," Jon Jarl muttered. "I've just got to."

Was Jon Jarl on some dangerous mission? Pursuing ruthless space bandits? Going to the rescue of some trapped expedition? Racing against time to prevent some tragic disaster?

Finally, he applied the braking rockets, as Ganymede came within sight. Ganymede was the largest moon of Jupiter, one of eleven. Jon landed his ship with a shuddering impact and leaped out. In fact, he shot out of the door like a cannonball and raced along as fast as his legs could maneuver. Panting, he pulled up, gulping for air.

Was he too late? Had all his frantic speed and effort been in vain? Had he failed—miserably failed?—

"Kriax," said a smiling voice. "You made it. You have time to get in your seat before the first event starts. Two dollars, please."

Gasping in relief, Jon paid and entered the stadium. Over its wide portals hung a huge sign—SPACE OLYMPICS! OPEN COMPETITION BETWEEN TEAMS OF ALL WORLDS!

Yes, Jon Jarl had made it under the wire, for the first event. Jon took his seat and stared around the tremendous open-air amphitheatre, seeing some half-million souls from a dozen worlds. This was the main sports event of the year, with the champion athletes of every world competing.

An amplified voice rang over the crowd. "Ladies and gentlemen! The first event will be the High Jump. Balston of Earth—Goodall of Mars—Zendor of Venus—." The life drained on and then the athletes performed, one by one.

THE crowd was quiet over the first three jumps. There was nothing remarkable—nothing over 16 feet. But when Goodall of Mars raised it to 16 feet, 7 inches, a cheer went up. He was the man to beat.

The present Ganymede record for the High Jump was 16 feet, 9 inches. Funny, mused Jon, how such a record on Earth would be a fantastic sensation. On Earth, high-jumpers seldom got over six feet. But here on Ganymede, where gravity was one-fifth of Earth's, athletes only weighed one-fifth as much. Therefore, quite logically, they could perform much more amazing feats of strength and speed. Yet, with gravity only one-fifth, it did not mean you could jump five times as high. There were certain laws of physics that limited the results.

A cheer rocked the stadium as Balston of Earth won the High Jump, with one-half inch short of 17 feet. It was a new World's Record for Ganymede.

The Broad Jump next resulted in a record leap of 65 feet. That would be impossible on Earth, of course. The jumpers looked like huge frogs, bounding over the sand pits. This time a member of the Martian team won. Exactly as the sports experts had predicted, it would settle down to a contest between the two top-notch teams—those of Earth and Mars. None of the other teams stood a chance, except for the remote possibility of the team from Saturn's moon.

More records tumbled off. The shot-puts went to 140 feet. The javelin throw reached 300 yards. The pole-vault hit just under 38 feet. But Jon's attention wandered for a moment, as with a sudden surge of recognition, he saw the beely man sitting a few seats to the side. That heavy-jowled, egg-eyes, walk cigar travelling from side to side of his mouth, and the flashy checked suit—it was One Shot Morgan, the big-time gambler. If he had a bet on the Olympics—which was illegal of course—he was not pleased with the way things were going. He was scowling.

Jon surmised he had bet against the Earth team, for Earth was now ahead on points, with Mars trailing. "If I could only trap that chiseler," Jon sighed to himself. But he dismissed the thought, for One Shot Morgan had always been too cunning to let the police pin anything on him.

An intermission was called, and the crowd turned to buying the Warmies and Sniffs sold through the stands by hawkers. Gany-mede was a chilly world, and the Warmies did exactly as their name implied. They were a form of peppery food that shot waves of heat through the body. Also the Sniffs—a sniff out of an oxygen-bottle—did wonders in peppering you up. Gany-mede has a thin atmosphere and the extra oxygen was almost necessary.

During the intermission, Jon decided to try to see his old schoolmate—Ron Ralston of the Earth team. Jon threaded his way below the stands and to the athletic barracks. The guard stopped him, but then seeing his Space Patrol uniform, let him through. Quite like the 20th century, a police uniform in 2261 A.D. was a magic talisman in such things.

Jon looked over the athletes getting rubdowns, but Ralston was not there. "He got a message to meet someone outside," informed the trainer. "I hope he gets back soon for his rubdown. He's our star runner, ya know. If he wins the 100-yard dash, we got the Mars team out-pointed, and we win."

Jon went out to look for his friend, and saw dim figures under the shadows of the overhead stands. As Jon approached, unnoticed, voices came to him, and he recognized the grating tones of One Shot Morgan, the gambler. What was going on?

"Listen," Morgan was saying to Ralston, a tall blond athlete. "This is your last chance, Ralston. Take this money and lose the race. Then the Mars team wins, and I collect big money."

Ralston had evidently been fighting for control of his temper all this while, without speaking. Now his voice shot out. "You filthy scoundrel! Is that what you called me out here for? The answer is no. And I'm going to report you for attempted bribery."

"You are?" grinned Morgan. But his grin was deadly, and his two strong-arm men stiffened. "Get to work on him, boys. Musc him up good. He won't run the final race unless he wants to limp through it."

THE thud of fists cracked out, as the two hoodlums obeyed and fell upon Ralston. He fought back, but it was a sure thing that—win or lose—he would be in no condition to run a race.

It was at this moment that Jon Jaal stepped from behind a pillar. He made a long leap forward, almost as long as the Broad Jump record, and fell in beside Ralston.

"Back, Ron," he ordered. "Let me handle this. You've got a race to run."

"As I live and breathe," grinned Ralston. "My old school chum, Jon Jaal. Now I feel sorry for One Shot Morgan and his two pals."

The two hoodlums made the mistake of trying to jump Jon Jaal together. Jon let the weight press him down till his knees were doubled, then flexed upward like a shot. One man's head hit the stands overhead, and that was the last he knew. The other man recovered his balance and swung viciously for Jon's face—only it wasn't there. The return blow from Jon was like a meteor striking.

One Shot Morgan had watched in a sort of fascinated horror, as his two men went down. Now his hand plunged into his coat for a ray-gun—but he stopped with a groan for Jon's gun already aimed straight for him.

"Huh," said Morgan, recovering his aplomb. "You ain't got anything on me, copper. Try and prove anything of what you might have overheard. It's your word against mine, in court."

Jon held up a small electrical device, hardly bigger than his palm. "Every word you said before is recorded by this Midget Dictaphone. This is one time you go behind bars, Morgan."

Jon was back in his seat in time to watch the final event. Ralston ran the 100-yard dash in five and one-eighth seconds, beating the Mars runner. Earth had won the Space Olympics for 2261.

"Thanks to Jon Jaal," Ralston told his team-mates as they pounded him on the back. "You know, that guy used to beat me in every race back at varsity. Too bad he became a space cop instead of an athlete."
